As the first German Emergency Medical Team (EMT), CADUS has been providing emergency medical assistance in Gaza since February 2024.

According to the WHO (March 4, 2025), the war following Hamas' attack on Israel, which left 1,200 dead and 239 hostages, has killed over 50,000 people and injured more than 113,000 in the Palestinian territories.

Hundreds of thousands of people have been displaced within Gaza and separated from their families several times since then. People are trapped in the tiny territory and exposed to the fighting. Humanitarian aid is being massively hampered by Israel. The Gaza Strip has been extensively destroyed, and shortages are widespread. Only about half of all health facilities are still partially operational. Medical personnel and humanitarian relief workers, the majority of them Palestinians, are repeatedly killed. They do tremendous work under the most adverse conditions.

Despite this, and precisely because of this, we have a team in Gaza, providing emergency medical assistance, training, and specialized patient transport. We've already helped several thousand people in this way.

We won't let ourselves be discouraged. In the face of crises, division, and injustice, our response remains: solidarity!

Factor war zone

Our mission in Gaza is very challenging, especially with regard to the team's safety: We are located in an active war zone where humanitarian aid workers, medical personnel, and civilian infrastructure have also been affected by attacks. According to the UN, 399 humanitarian aid workers and 1,060 medical personnel have been killed so far.

The work of humanitarian organizations is repeatedly hampered by the conflict parties. Our teams have also been subjected to arbitrary treatment, threats, and attacks by the Israeli army.

Logistics is also difficult to organize. Strict regulations also apply to humanitarian goods and medical equipment. Restricted border crossings make planning for transport and team changes even more difficult.

In such an emotionally and politically charged conflict, public relations is also a challenge. Adhering to humanitarian principles is therefore all the more important to us.

Rescue workers and humanitarian relief workers are also repeatedly falling victim to Israeli attacks on Gaza. Photo: CADUS

Support of local rescue services

Our mission is coordinated through the EMT structure of the World Health Organization (WHO). Among other things, it handles communication with the conflict parties.

On February 5, 2024, the first CADUS team entered Gaza. Since then, we have supported our local colleagues in several hospital emergency rooms and worked together with the Palestinian Red Crescent (PCRS) at several Trauma Stabilization Points (TSPs). Together, we have been able to care for over 4,600 seriously injured and ill patients.

Due to the ongoing bombing, we have repeatedly been confronted with mass casualty incidents. This requires treating a large number of seriously injured patients within a short period of time. This is a particularly stressful task, especially given the limited resources in the war zone.

Since November 2024, we have also been providing medical support for the permanent presence of the UN and other aid organizations in North Gaza.

Medical Evacuations (MedEvac)

According to UN estimates*, up to 13,000 patients in Gaza require treatment abroad.

Since March 2024, we have been conducting regular medical evacuations (MedEvac). Patients are transported to hospitals under difficult conditions to ensure adequate medical care. With the ability to transport intensive care patients, we fill a critical gap in the rescue chain within Gaza.

Most of the transports take place from the north to the south of Gaza. If possible, the patients are treated there or evacuated further abroad. However, the need for MedEvacs is significantly greater than has been possible so far.

For this purpose, we have a team of 9-10 people on site, 4-5 of whom are medically trained, as well as two ambulances equipped with equipment to provide care for seriously injured and ill patients during the journey.

Live-saving trainings

In our medical training courses, we impart knowledge and techniques that can save lives in an emergency.

In addition to local medical colleagues, participants are primarily laypeople. A total of 321 people have now completed one of our four training courses. In courses such as "Stop the Bleed" and "Basic Trauma Management," participants learn how to treat wounds, stop bleeding, and stabilize circulation as first responders.

In a war zone like Gaza, the training courses help people care for their own family, friends, and neighbors in an emergency.

The training courses also promote the self-help capacities of local communities beyond the acute situation.

In our training, we teach important techniques, such as applying a tourniquet to tie off extremities with heavily bleeding wounds and thus prevent bleeding to death. Photo: CADUS

Deployment planning in the Makerspace

Mission planning and preparation take place at the CADUS Crisis Response Makerspace in Berlin.

At the logistics area not only the necessary equipment and medications are packed, but also briefings and safety trainings are conducted here.

Our HEAT (Hostile Environment Awareness Training) is of central importance. In this multi-day, full-day course, participants are prepared in a practical way for their deployment in conflict zones. Living and working together in a group is just as important as behavior at checkpoints, making decisions under extreme stress, and planning and conducting missions in dangerous areas.
